RWANDA:

New Government Preoccupied With Security

President Bizimungu and Prime Minister Twagiramungu, both Hutus, announced an 8-point program of peace and repatriation of refugees but said one of the government's first tasks will be to punish those responsible for the massacres. Twagiramungu has told [] that some officials of the Hutu-dominated Republican National Movement for Democracy and Development (MRND) party must be included in the new governments.

- The Tutsi-dominated Rwandan Patriotic Front, however, has told [] multipartyism may not be possible and ruled out including any MRND members in the government, highlighting the limited influence Hutu politicians are likely to exert in the new government. []

The return of Hutu refugees to Rwanda and the resumption of normal agricultural activities would drastically reduce requirements for emergency food aid, but the RPF has been reluctant to cooperate with international relief agencies, and planting must begin within 30 days. The RPF told [] it is allowing farmers to harvest the current crop only in those areas where their security can be ensured. The International Red Cross reports that more than 3 million Rwandans will require long-term food aid because most crops are now spoiling in the field. []

Meanwhile, the Hutu government-in-exile claims it will attack unless the RPF permits free elections. A mobile Hutu radio station claims that the 5 million exiled Hutus could easily force their way back into power.

- [] reports that the RPF has closed the border crossing at Goma, but many Hutu army soldiers have already crossed into Zaire with weapons, including 37-mm antiaircraft guns.
- Until it is satisfied that its borders are secure and pockets of Hutu troops in the northwest are no longer a threat, the RPF will continue to give the international humanitarian relief effort a low priority []
